NEW QUESTION: 3

Which three statements are true about the management of Oracle Services?

- A. Oracle Enterprise Manager or SRVCTL should be used to control cluster-managed services, not DBMS_SERVICE.
- B. Users who share a service should have different service-level requirements.
- C. To manage workloads or a group of applications, you can define services for a particular application or a subset of an application's operations.
- D. Similar work can be categorized under services to ease workload management.

Answer: A,C,D

Explanation:

Using Oracle Services

To manage workloads or a group of applications, you can define services that you assign to a particular application or to a subset of an application's operations. You can also group work by type under services. For example, online users can use one service, while batch processing can use another and reporting can use yet another service to connect to the database. Oracle recommends that all users who share a service have the same service level requirements. You can define specific characteristics for services and each service can represent a separate unit of work. There are many options that you can take advantage of when using services. Although you do not have to implement these options, using them helps optimize application performance. Oracle does not recommend using the DBMS_SERVICE package for use with services used by an Oracle RAC database. Use SRVCTL or Oracle Enterprise Manager to create database services for Oracle RAC.
