NEW QUESTION: 2

The First Banking Group's decision to invest in an electronic network for transferring funds was based on a cost advantage over a nonelectronic system of about ten dollars per transaction in using an electronic system. Executives reasoned further that the system would give them an advantage over competitors.

Which of the following, if it is a realistic possibility, most seriously weakens the executives' projection of an advantage over competitors?

- A. The cost advantage of using the electronic system will not increase sufficiently to match the pace of inflation.
- B. Competitors will for the same reasons install electronic systems, and the resulting overcapacity will lead to mutually damaging price wars.
- C. Equipment used in the electronic network for transferring funds will be compatible with equipment used in other such networks.
- D. Large banks from outside the area served by the First Banking Group have recently established branches in that area as competitors to the First Banking Group.
- E. The electronic system will provide a means for faster transfer of funds, if the First Banking Group wishes to provide faster transfer to its customers.
